

I wonder if there is one scientist anywhere who is so foolish as to imagine that the ultimate nature of things & ourselves will ever be reached by physics & psychology respectively?

As a matter of fact "psychology" deals with everything BUT the nature of mind itself.

Facing this dilemma it is welcome news that there is a way to break through. The experience so obtained is personal & can be passed only to a few.

Yet "millions" of people follow the Buddha's remarks & call it a "religion". In the case of Christianity we call it "God". Then people say to me — oh, your "work" is "religious", it is to find "God".

I agree with them, to avoid semantics, but isn't it obvious that THIS PUTS THE CART BEFORE THE HORSE!!

The "experience" is primary & at this stage there are NO NAMES, NO DESCRIPTIONS.

If some idiots want to make something (a new religion !!) out of my remarks they can, but it will not mean a thing.

But I have drifted from psychotherapy to the question of awakening "work". So to another point.

GURU You are not "denied" any method of convincing yourself. But what "methods" are there? I never had any trouble recognizing the genuine — especially since you do not find it in a blue moon.

CONCEPTS "A new concept must either offer considerable data to indicate other concepts insufficient --."

What is this vague sort of talk? Poppycock?

All "concepts" are useless for our purpose.
